Not illustrated. 1909 Excerpt: . of the two forms of the aldoxime would then be due to the difference in linking between the carbon and nitrogen atoms in the two cases. Similar reasoning applies to the ketoximes, the structure to be assigned to the two forms differing in the union between the carbon and nitrogen atoms and the reactions of these forms differing according to the influence of that union. In the Beckmann rearrangement, the group which would exchange positions with the hydroxyl depends upon the nature of that group as compared with the nature of the nitrogen atom. The structural formulae considered so far have been assumed, as is general in organic chemistry, to be perfectly definite in any case, the linkings between the atoms, as determined by the reactions, decompositions and syntheses of the substances being fixed in position and not moving indiscriminately within the molecule. There remains to be considered the group of substances which behave towards one set of reagents as though possessing a certain structure and towards another as though possessing a different structure, the difference consisting in most cases in the change in position of a hydrogen atom. This group of substances are included under the general grouping of tautomeric substances, although there have been various subdivisions with different names introduced. Using the conception of the transfer of a corpuscle as being the cause of the establishment of a linking, as represented in organic compounds, it is evident that the difference between the two...
