Excerpt: . . . sleight of hand and magic, still more because their songs and dances and jests were judged unwholesome for the public morals. 15 Probably the early street performances varied little from those so gaily painted by Garzoni and Coryat a century later, although by 1600 official intolerance was somewhat less marked than it had been. Coryat, an open-minded English traveler who saw Venice in 1608, begins his description: I hope it will not be esteemed for an impertence to my discourse, if I next speake of the Mountebanks of Venice, seeing that amongst other things that doe much famouse this Citie, these two sorts of people, namely the Cortezans and the Mountebanks, are not the least: for although there are Mountebanks also in other Cities of Italy: yet because there is a greater concourse of them in Venice then else where, and that of the...
